Q: Unit testing C++ structures I'm trying to find out a solution to unit testing C++ structures. Which is what I'd like to do, for example a std::map. The unit testing framework should require a h file: template struct MappedContainer { Key Key; Value Value; }; and a.cpp file: template struct MappedContainer { Key Key; Value Value; }; How to do I implement the framework? I've seen JUnit, but it doesn't support templates. Can I use that in my case, maybe? A: Template code is compiled to an abstraction of the type that you have created, so unless you have a dependency on the MappedContainer template, there's no reason to have it defined in a header file. You can test the.cpp file directly. However, it makes sense to define your structure in a header file for a few reasons: The template is free to be used in other places, and when it does, the compiler will work harder to check compatibility with your structure. If you want to create a template class that uses MappedContainer, then you may want to force the user to supply the types and initialize them at the same
