sensory fibres in Paralepidotus senex, a long-jawed eelpout. The nervous and muscular systems of the eelpout, Paralepidotus senex, was investigated in the light of the somewhat irregular arrangement of the portion of the spinal cord and the larger part of the telencephalon found in this species, and the role of the palatal and hyoid musculature, which is completely innervated by the vagus system. Four types of motoneurons were observed: a set of medially located spinal motoneurons, a set of laterally placed motoneurons and two groups of motoneurons in an intermediate position, which innervate the zygomatic and hyoid musculature, respectively. The latter two groups of motoneurons are distributed throughout the entire length of the telencephalon. The distribution of the somatic sensory fibres was mapped using the cobalt backfilling technique, and the distribution patterns of the palatal, hy
