The present invention generally relates to magnetic data storage devices, and more specifically, to reducing the vertical magnetic flux for stored data bits in magnetic data storage devices. Magnetic data storage devices such as hard disk drives are widely used for storing information in computers and other electronic devices. In conventional magnetic disk drives, data are written into a disk as magnetic flux transitions of a magnetic field. A transducer, such as a read/write head, is positioned over the recording medium to write and read information to and from the disk. The transducer is supported by an air bearing slider, which typically incorporates a
